GREEKS ON THE RUN

NEXT MORNING, Zeus watched as the two armies woke and prepared to fight. At sunrise, the Greek chariots charged through the strong new gates and down on to the plain. Immediately, the Trojan chariots flew out of the city to meet them.

Metal clashed as the two armies met and the soldiers bellowed their war-cries at each other. Soon, screams rang across the plain and the earth was red with blood. Neither army would give ground.

But, at midday, Zeus took out his golden scales and held them high. Into one pan he put death for the Trojans. Into the other – death for the Greeks. Holding the balance steady, he waited to see which death carried more weight.

Slowly, inexorably, the Trojan side rose into the air and the Greek side sank down towards the earth.

Zeus acted at once. His thunder rolled over the Greek army and he
